A Windy Day

This wind brings all dead things to life,
Branches that lash the air like whips
And dead leaves rolling in a hurry
Or peering in a rabbit's bury
Or trying to push down a tree;
Gates that fly open to the wind
And close again behind,
And fields that are a flowing sea
And make the cattle look like ships;

Straws glistening and stiff
 Lying on air as on a shelf
 And pond that leaps to leave itself;
 And feathers too that rise and float,
 Each feather changed into a bird,
 And line-hung sheets that crack and strain;
 Even the sun- greened coat,
 That through so many winds has served,
 The scarecrow struggles to put on again.

Andrew Young

Test 15

Read the text and answer the questions.

(10 marks)

One evening in winter, Miss Mixter came home from seeing a show in town. As she reached her porch, she heard a furious muted mewling in the bushes.

She paused, listened, then said aloud, “This is not my affair,” and let herself into the house.

“A stray. A neighbour’s pet just passing by. Nothing to do with me.”

She put the kettle on for tea

It was a windy night, and snug inside, she could not hear anything outside. In her mind, though, she could hear. The cry had been that of a kitten, not a cat. To her expert ear, it had been the angry complaint of hunger.

“Well by now it had gone, I’m sure,” she said. “It wouldn’t linger at a stranger’s house on a night like this.

Miss Mixter, over the year, had got in the way of talking aloud to her cats, and now that she had no audience or companion, could not teach herself to think thought silently.

“Still, I suppose I shall have to check. Though I’m sure,” She repeated, “that by now it’s gone.”

The night air had gotten colder, and a sprinkle of snow- flakes had begun to toss in the wind.

“As I thought,” said Miss Mixter. “Gone, quite gone.”

A tiny yowl greeted this comment. The light from the porch revealed a skinny, big- eyed kitten, wobbling and grumbling onto the pathway.

“Well,” said Miss Mixter, “I’ve had lot of experience with cats, but I’ve never seen one quite as homely as you, and that’s a fact.”

“Yaaah!” said the kitten, trying to climb the steps.

She realized, however, that the battle was lost, so she went down the steps, picked up the kitten, carried him into the house, and closed the door.

“You’ll be wanting to eat,” she informed him, and the thought crossed her mind that it was pleasant to have someone to talk to again.

She offered the kitten a saucer of warm milk and corn flakes.

After supper he fell asleep in front of the fire, Miss Mixter, dreamily content, sat on the sofa and read.
